Frank Roche hesitated for a moment and his good looking face slightly flushed. "It's a very queer story," he said. "Unite Walter, you never spoke to me much of my self, before I go to roost."

Colonel Roche, grimly, "And may I ask how this fellow know all this ?" "Lorimer's husband, a man called Twiss, gave me the money, and he persuaded Lorimer to tell him all the story of Lady Engismore's girlhoof, and the supposed loss at sea of her first hasband. Uncle, I believe there is something in it. Whywon't you tell me what you know?"

" Because,"-began Colonel Roche, and then be checked himself. "Come along, Frank," he said a moment later, "to my hotel; it strikes me this conversation had better be carried on in the strictest privacy; not of course that anyone can hear us."

He rose as he spoke, and left his club followed by Francis Roche. Colonel Roche at this time had an appointment at Woolwich, and frequenty came up to town, staying when he did so st the Grosvenor Hotel. He was staying there now, and speedily Francis Roche found himself in a very comfortably furnished apartment. "You mu t let me think this affair quietly over, Frank," hesaid as be handed Francis Roole his box of cigars, and rang for brandy and sodis. But now tell me from beginning to end
